THE BEAT OF THE YEAR

By Robert Livingston Beecher.

(Copyright, 1909, by the Pearson Publishing Co.)

When he returned, his face was flushed with excitement.

"It's going swimmingly, McGinnis," he said, as he bent over the copy-paper. "Dallin's in the office now and has been warned to wait. Steed himself on the way up to the house now. We've got two photos of him and a two-column cut. I had Steed ask Dallin if he knew our friend here and he said he did. Knows him well."

"Bully for you!" said the Irishman.

An hour later, Bruce went out and returned almost immediately.

"The butter at the house," he exclaimed, as he slipped into the chair at the desk and pushed his hat back on his head. "The butter says our friend left there early yesterday evening. He hasn't been back yet."

Bruce wrote on hurriedly in silence. At intervals, the big man in the Morris chair made the rounds of the three prisoners and tested their bonds and tags.

At midnight, Bruce looked at his watch and turned round.

"I'm most done, McGinnis," he said, quietly. "Go to that stable where we left your runabout and have a closed carriage and a coachman who knows how to keep his mouth shut outside here in half an hour."

The half hour had five minutes yet to go when the young man at the desk jumped to his feet and flung the pencil down on a mass of copy-paper covered with writing in a large boyish hand.

"There!" he exclaimed. "It's done—for better or worse. Chiefly better, I hope. At any rate, it's got a few facts Connors hasn't got. I guess."

He crossed the room to one of the windows. A closed carriage was just stopping outside. A moment later, the Irishman re-entered the room.

"Hold the fort just a trifle longer, McGinnis," said Bruce. "Just another short session at the phone and I'm ready."

When he returned, his youthful face showed his satisfaction.

"I've just been phoning one of the office employees," he explained, hurriedly. "He'll be waiting for us inside the side door, which is always kept locked. I had him go down to the Sunday Room on the second floor near the staircase which leads to the private entrance, and he reports that the Sunday staff have gone home for the night. We'll smuggle our man in there and then I'll go and report progress."

McGinnis grinned. Then he nodded towards the open door on either side of him.

"How about the janitor and the cop?" he asked.

"We'll let them stay quiet here," he replied. "Until the last edition's on the street. After that the deluge. Our friend in the bedroom may raise an awful howl, but I guess we can weather it. We're in for it, anyway."

Twenty minutes later, a closed carriage stopped outside the newspaper building. The three men disappeared inside.

In the darkness, Bruce turned to the man with the key.

"Is the Sunday Room door unlocked, Al?" he whispered.

"Yes, sir."

"Then go up to the top of the stairs, hold the gate open at the top, and, when the hall is clear, whistle."

The man went up the stairs and turned the corner of the elevator shaft. The iron gate clicked.

Bruce and McGinnis carried their burden half way up and waited. A moment later, a low whistle came down to them.

When the door of the Sunday Room had closed behind the four, Bruce gave a sigh of relief.

"I don't know that we needed to be so mysterious about it at this end," he said, "but it's better to be on the safe side. It's better not to let too many people know whom we've got here before we print the news ourselves."

He turned to McGinnis.

"Stay with our friend, Mac," he said, smiling. "Al will look you both in and then I'll go and huri a harpoon into Connors."

In the hall outside, a copy-boy was hurrying by with a bundle of first editions under his arm. Down in the basement, the great presses were still rumbling.

Bruce grabbed one of the papers and held up the front page under a ceiling light. His eye instantly fell upon a large, single-column "spread head." It ran as follows:

MAN'S HEADLESS BODY FOUND IN NEW-TOWN CREEK

Guldensuppe Case Recalled by Gruesome Discovery at Long Island City

NO CLUE TO THE VICTIM'S IDENTITY

Body Had on Only an Undershirt from which Laundry Marks Had Been Removed

POLICE SUSPECT BLACK HAND

Detectives Seeking Man Who Hired Two-seated Rig and Abandoned it in the Streets

Bruce read it through, glanced at the first paragraphs of the story, and laughed. Then he stuffed the paper in his pocket and started down the long hall at whose end lay the brightly-lighted City Room.

As he passed along, a young man stepped out from one of the side rooms and caught him by the arm. Bruce turned quickly.

"Oh, hello, Steed!" he said.

"What's up, Bruce?" queried the other. "They've been asking about you all night. Connors is sore as hell. He's been knocking like an anvil chorus. The Night City was just asking me about you, too. I swore I hadn't seen or heard of you since noon. Don't give me away, will you?"

THE FLASHING GEMS OF THIS TERRITORY

The Great Stock of Arizona Semi-Precious Stones at Balke's Big Curio Store.

The winter residents of the city are about to leave for their eastern and northern homes. They will want to carry with them some pleasing mementos of their residence here; one that can be conveniently taken and will not cost a great deal. They are advised to look over the stock of native Arizona gems at Balke's Big Curio Store. A larger and more beautiful stock of semi-precious stones was never got together and never before were they ever offered for so little money.

The stock embraces turquoise, garnets, rubies, sapphires, white, pink and blue, peridot, tourmaline and there there may be mentioned the beautiful fire-flashing Mexican opals.

These stones may be obtained either loose or mounted. The mounted stones in gold, come in rings, stickpins, bracelets, brooches, cuff buttons, shirt studs and many other useful articles.

If one has a ring or other article of jewelry from which the setting has been lost it will be replaced cheaply at the Big Curio Store. Or, if one has a gem which he wants mounted the Big Curio Store will do it for less money than it will cost any where else along the coast.

beasts, clean and unclean." The little house is crumbling away. It is the care of an equally weather-beaten-looking Mohammedan in the tiny courtyard he stood filling an old, battered goatskin with water from a dilapidated cistern. Nothing marred the perfect harmony of antiquity, but the view from the roof of the house was more inspiring. Below lay the town, and its orange groves, stretching sleepy and quaint to the blue sea's edge. To the east were the fertile Plains of Sharon, and beyond the hills, on whose rocky summits Jerusalem lay.—Ruth Bryan Owens in National Monthly.

THROUGH BIBLE LANDS.

So plainly are the Bible pictures those of the daily life of Palestine, and so unchanging has the life here continued through the centuries, that the parables are stories any Syrian might now use to illustrate his discourse.

The traveler who expects creature comforts as an adjunct to devoutness will be disappointed. But if he is willing to be transported in spirit back through the years, and follow humbly the roads over which the divinely humble son of a Syrian carpenter led his little band of fishermen and artisans—this he may do.

The Biblical sight to which the traveler in Jaffa is first led is to the house of Peter's vision, and if the streets leading thereto were formerly in the same condition in which we found them it is small wonder that Peter dreamed of "all manner of
